

OpinionSpace.net Launches Social Networking With Teeth

For Immediate Release

WEST VANCOUVER, Canada/EWORLDWIRE --- No subject matter is untouchable or sacred, should surfers who meet the content at opinionspace.net make even a cursory stop-over. The site forms the comedic fodder of bloggers who might be stuck for a story to spin, and it brings reason to random content that makes it possible to defend the indefensible - in a public forum.

Founder Alias Pseudonym set up opinionspace.net to transport people to an array of bold arguments by philosophers whose fringe thoughts resemble a riot at the World Cup. It may perhaps be a completely inappropriate venue for visits by any oversensitive conservative, but it is a completely appropriate meeting space for the free thinking and outrageous.

From experts to the evil Bratz brand, opinionspace.net in online space might well be compared to the Howard Stern show of the air waves - people love the site because it covers the matters most people are afraid to touch with even a casual thought. From Obama to outlaw motorcycle clubs, to private schools and political correctness, no subject is safe from dissection.

Expanding his site a fathom further into the shadows of the human mind - if it's possible - Alias continues his inspired comedic rants, which border on the out-there, in an uncut and expanded volume of his opinions appropriately entitled, "The Philosopher's Bible." Included commentary effectively shakes any human from stupor-like state.

The public is invited to join in the discussions at opinionspace.net - regardless of education, experience, ethnicity, or any other dubious social boundary.

Facebook may well ask who you are, Twitter may well demand to know what you are doing, but opinionspace.net doesn't care about those things. Opinionspace.net asks what you think and why you think it and invites you to tell the world where it is wrong.
